NEW MIAMI COMMUNITY WILL BOAST LUXURIOUS MANMADE LAGOONS

Developers of the 183-acre bayside project are bringing a beach to residents.

Can a manmade body of water be more compelling than the ocean? Planners of a new 183-acre development under construction in North Miami will soon find out. Developers of the SoLe Mia community are hoping to woo residents with the first-ever "crystal" lagoons in South Florida. Two 7- to 10-acre manmade lagoons of fresh water will be the focal point of the project's luxurious amenities. Project planners says they will provide a safe and protected environment for residents and visitors to enjoy aquatic activities such as kayaking, swimming, paddleboarding, and sailing. The property is on the edge of Biscayne Bay, across a causeway from the beach.

The crystal lagoons will serve as a social epicenter for the community, says Michael Tillman, managing director at LeFrak, one of the real estate developers working on the project. “Creating this one-of-a-kind aquatic oasis will play an integral part in fulfilling our vision for an infill urban waterfront neighborhood that will make its iconic mark on South Florida.”
